7. The website www.futurenow.org may be useful to find answers about how much energy is used around the planet. And if someone is planning a journey, puts in his/her route to compare the energy used by different types of transport, and chooses the one that's best for the environment.

8. The website www.ourworld.org lists the best places online to learn the latest results of scientific studies on issues affecting the environment. Or if someone prefers working things out for him or herself, there are experiments to do like making his or her own power using sunlight! It is also useful to find information on groups all over the planet working to protect the environment.

9. The website www.cleanplanet.org can help people to discover how waste plastic, glass and metal are turned into new products and demonstrate clips showing different methods used around the world. There's also a section on how much different fashion brands pay attention to their environmental impact. It can be used to keep up with new trends!

10. The website www.globaleco.org explores the importance of energy in people's daily lives and also different ways of generating it without using oil or gas, for example by using wind power instead. There are links to UK companies that use these renewable energies, so it can be useful to find out more about what they do.

11. The website www.eco.org may help to contact others who also care about environmental issues and find information about volunteering groups; search for one to join in the local area. It can also help to find out if someone's choice of transport damages the planet. If so, it is simple to try the easy changes to that routine suggested here.

12. The website www.planetmatters.org helps to learn about what top scientists involved in research to protect our planet do day after day, as well as about their latest discoveries. There's a message board so it will be available to post questions to them. There will be always a chance to get a quick reply. There's also a recycling section — to find different uses for things that might be otherwise put in the bin.

13. The website www.worldaware.org helps people to know what they can do to help protect our world. This site has everything required to know about recycling: why it's important around the world, and how to get rid of items safely in their neighbourhood without harming the environment.

14. The website www.oneworld.org has lots of environmental information here, whether someone is just starting to explore the subject, or wanting to find out about the latest research. Gifts are on sale, too, made from objects and materials that are often thrown out. One can treat him or herself and help the planet! There's also a guide about using less power at home to help you save money.

Read the text and choose the correct heading for each paragraph from the list of headings below. There are more headings than paragraphs, so you will not use all of them. You cannot use any heading more than once. Mark your answers on the answer sheet.

RULES TO LIVE BY TO EAT HEALTHIER

A) Reduced saturated fat products	E) Avoid fast and convenient processed food at lunch time
B) Take your time	F) Avoid frying food
C) Ask for salad dressings on the side	G) Reduce plate size
D) Drink water	H) Make sure your plate contains enough salad or vegetables

15. It can take up to 20 minutes for your brain to register that you are full. Take more time to eat a meal and focus on chewing eat mouthful without rushing, to ensure you stop eating once you are full. If you rush food, you are more likely to overeat and therefore gain weight.

16. By ensuring you drink plenty of water each day you are not only benefiting from a reduction of calories found in juices, squashes and fizzy drinks, you are also ensuring you are not confusing thirst for hunger and intaking more calories through food than required. Plus, keeping hydrated is great for your skin, and your energy levels will improve too!

17. Frying food will without a doubt make your meal higher in calories, and the taste may not even be as nice. Make every effort to bake, boil or steam food instead. This applies to most things you want to cook including meat and vegetables.

18. Food on the run whilst out of the house at work or in-between the school run for example can generally mean less healthy options. Plus, the cost can be higher. Why not try and make better choices by either preparing a packed lunch to take with you or visiting many healthier food outlets now available such a vegetarian/vegan cafe or a salad bar.

19. If you follow the rule that at least a third of your meal should be made up of vegetables or salad, you will be on track to achieving a balanced meal. This will also help you meet your '5-a day' requirements. Try to fill up on vegetables or salad before eating the more indulgent elements of your meal.

20. It sounds obvious but if you have very large plates in your homes, your portion sizes are going to be bigger and you are going to eat more, meaning you are consuming more calories every day. By making the small change and purchasing smaller plates you are more likely to eat a reasonably sized meal.

STREET GRAFFITI: THE VOICE OF THE UNHEARD

Street graffiti, as a form of public expression, began to grow in major cities like New York and Philadelphia during the 1960s and 1970s. This period was marked by social and economic challenges, especially for youth living in disadvantaged neighborhoods. Feeling ignored by the government and wider society, many young people began using graffiti as a way to be noticed and to express their personal identities. It became a tool to demand recognition and to share their stories.

At first, graffiti mostly involved writing one's name or a nickname—known as a "tag"—on public surfaces like buildings, buses, and subway trains. Writers often added numbers to their names, usually connected to the street they lived on or another personal detail. One of the early graffiti writers, "Taki 183," became well-known after his tag appeared in many parts of New York City. Others, like an anonymous artist called John, stood out not only for their style but also for adding strong social messages to their art.

As graffiti became more popular, it grew more complex. Writers formed groups known as "crews" to create larger and more colorful works. These murals could cover entire walls and often required teamwork and planning. This shift in style happened around the same time that hip-hop culture was developing. Graffiti, alongside rap, DJing, and breakdancing, became one of hip-hop's core elements, giving graffiti deeper cultural meaning and a sense of purpose.

Not everyone viewed this art form positively. Some city officials saw it as illegal and damaging. They passed laws to remove graffiti and punish those who created it. Many people opposed officially supporting graffiti because they believed it encouraged disrespect for public property and could lead to crime.

Still, graffiti continued to evolve. Many artists today use it to raise awareness about important issues such as poverty, inequality, and discrimination. A large number of graffiti artists come from communities that are often overlooked, and their work gives a voice to those who might otherwise remain unheard.

In modern times, graffiti has entered art galleries and museums. Artists like Banksy have helped shift public opinion, showing that street art can be powerful and meaningful. Banksy's gallery work has celebrated street graffiti rather than criticized it. In addition, technology now plays a role. Some artists use Artificial Intelligence (AI) to design murals or create digital versions of their work.

Even though not all cities accept or support graffiti, its influence continues to grow. From a rebellious act in the streets to a global art movement, street graffiti remains a powerful form of expression that changes with the times.

Read the following text for questions 30-35.

A NEW START AFTER 60

Gladys McGarey asserts that it is challenging to place a number on the events that occur in one's life. It makes sense that, at 102, she would feel that way. Shortly before she was 70, her husband, Bill, to whom she had been married for 46 years, handed her divorce papers. He had been carrying them in his briefcase for six months and said he would appreciate a prompt signature.

McGarey and Bill had not only been married for decades but were also close colleagues. They were both doctors, who had trained as general practitioners and were among the co-founders of the American Holistic Medical Association in 1978. For the duration of their marriage, they had shared a clinic in Phoenix, Arizona, as well as having six children together. So, when the marriage ended — Bill had started a relationship with another colleague — McGarey lost not only her life partner but her business partner, too.

"I was taken off guard. I was destroyed," she claims. Helene, her daughter, had lately joined the practice, so the mother and daughter parted ways and started a new clinic in adjacent Scottsdale.

While McGarey still had "something to get up for each morning", the pain of the separation was immense — "the hardest thing" she has ever faced. Harder, she says, than the two bouts of cancer she went through in her 30s and 90s.

"It's not a matter of getting over stuff, it's a matter of living through it," she says now, speaking on a Zoom call from the house that she built, at Helene's invitation, behind her daughter's home. "If you can live through the issues that you have been faced with, they become one of your teachers."

But it was a slow process. "It wasn't until I was 93 that I accepted it," she says. And, clutching the air with her hand: "You get to that part where you can kind of hang on."

When McGarey was returning from her and Helene's clinic, that's when things started to change. She had just been sent a marriage invite from Bill. "I screamed because I was so furious. Are you going to keep doing this, I asked myself as I pulled over to the side of the road. I mean, this is disgusting."

McGarey is a Presbyterian; her parents were medical missionaries, and she was raised in India till she was 15. In the car, a verse from the Bible came to her. "This is the day that the Lord has made, let us rejoice and be glad in it."

So she bought a licence plate for her car that read "BE GLAD", to remind her that there was a lot in her marriage "that I treasured". Looking back, McGarey can now see that her divorce was a critical and constructive turning point: "Before that, I didn't trust my voice." Being dyslexic meant that at school she always felt slow. “I didn’t think I had a voice,” she says, yet, “I knew I had a voice. After the divorce, it was no longer Bill and Gladys, it was Gladys McGarey MD. I reclaimed what I had, not just as Bill’s partner.”

“I don’t regret one minute that I spent as Bill’s wife,” she says. But, when he died in 2008, “My life has taken on these amazing dimensions that are completely not associated with him,” she says. “What I chose is working for me.” McGarey never remarried. “People would ask if I was dating and I would say: ‘Why would I want to take care of another old man? No thank you.’”

She retired at 86, but continues to offer telephone consultations; she has an appointment after we finish speaking. She no longer has a licence to practise, but, as she puts it: “Nobody told me I had to stop talking.” Indeed, at 100, she delivered a TEDx Talk — on holistic medicine and her central belief that she has “a colleague within each patient who does the healing, as I do the other part of the work which is what I know and understand in the field of medicine”. She has just published a book offering guidance for a well-lived life. Her hair, which she has not cut since her 40s, is neatly plaited into a white crown, ready as ever for work.

For questions 30-33, fill in the missing information in the numbered spaces. Write no more than ONE WORD and / or A NUMBER for each question.
